In February 1926, the house of "Veuve de Philippe Hüther", a watch dealer and maker, registered the trademark "The Tudor" established in Geneva for Rolex founder Hans Wilsdorf. Later, in 1936, the house transferred the brand to Wilsdorf.

I found my way into watch collecting in 2014, with the ubiquitous SKX009J. I agonized over spending a "huge" £135 on that watch for days, after scouring the reviews and forums, before pulling the trigger from a certain Asian website. This was where it all began, and for a time, I was satisfied with this fan-favourite diver. 2014, coincidentally, was the year that ...

Usually with all my automatic watches (including Tudor) my watches end up fully wound after two or the days of wearing. But some people move so little or make such different moves that the watch is adding any reserve during the day, this is very rare though.

Yet as luxury watch collectors now own an increasing number of watches, self-winding functionality becomes less useful as each watch is worn less often - so the power reserve indicator is still frequently handy. Even minimalist brands like Nomos now offer power reserve indicators, such as on its gorgeous Tangente.

Tudor is often seen in comparison to its main parent company, Rolex, with many considering Tudor as a stepping stone to Rolex-quality watches. Although Tudor lacks the same level of renown as Rolex, it provides many of the same attributes and craftsmanship at a more affordable price.
